

Communication

Placement Training Program

Verbal & Non-Verbal Communication

Effective communication is more than word choice — tone, pace, and clarity of verbal delivery, combined with non-verbal signals like posture, eye contact, and facial expression, together determine how a message actually lands, often more than the literal words used. In a professional or interview setting specifically, awareness of non-verbal habits (a tendency to look away when nervous, filler words like 'um' filling every pause) is the first step to consciously improving them, since most people are genuinely unaware of their own habits until specifically recorded or told.

Email & Business Writing

Professional written communication has its own conventions distinct from casual writing: a clear, specific subject line, a direct statement of purpose in the opening line rather than burying it in the third paragraph, appropriately formal tone without being stiff, and a clear call-to-action or next step at the close. Proofreading before sending — reading the message once specifically for tone (does this read as intended, or could it land as curt/rude?) separately from a pass checking for typos — catches two different categories of mistake that a single read-through tends to miss.

Public Speaking Basics

Public speaking anxiety is close to universal, and structure is what reliably reduces it in practice, not eliminating nerves entirely. A simple, reusable structure — a clear opening that states what you'll cover, a body organized into a small number of distinct points (three is a common, effective number), and a closing that reinforces the main takeaway — gives a speaker a mental map to follow even under nervous pressure, which matters more for actually getting through a talk well than any specific delivery technique.

Learn More

Toastmasters International — Public Speaking Resources

<https://www.toastmasters.org/>

Harvard Business Review — Communication

<https://hbr.org/topic/subject/communication>

Indeed Career Guide — Communication Skills

<https://www.indeed.com/career-advice/career-development/communication-skills>