

Interview Preparation

Placement Training Program

HR Interview Questions

HR interview questions ('Tell me about yourself,' 'Why should we hire you,' 'Where do you see yourself in five years') aren't asking for a life story or generic answer — they're testing self-awareness, communication clarity, and genuine fit for the specific role. A strong 'tell me about yourself' answer is a tight, structured 60-90 second narrative connecting relevant background to the specific role being interviewed for — not an unstructured chronological biography starting from childhood, which is a very common mistake under nervous pressure.

Technical Interview Strategy

In technical interviews, how you approach a problem is evaluated alongside whether you reach the correct final answer. The expected process: clarify the problem and any ambiguous requirements before writing any code, think out loud so the interviewer can follow your reasoning (a candidate who solves a problem in total silence gives an interviewer far less to evaluate positively, even with a correct final answer), discuss the time/space complexity of your approach, and test the solution against edge cases (empty input, single element, duplicates) before declaring it done.

Body Language

Interview body language communicates confidence and engagement independent of what's actually being said: steady (not constant, unbroken) eye contact, an upright but relaxed posture, and controlled hand gestures all read as confidence to an interviewer, while looking away for extended periods, slouching, or fidgeting can undercut even a strong verbal answer. As with public speaking, most people are unaware of their own specific habits until a recorded mock interview makes them visible — which is exactly why mock interviews with recorded playback are a core part of this module.

Salary Negotiation Basics

Salary negotiation for an entry-level or campus placement role is typically narrower in scope than a lateral hire's, but the fundamentals still apply: research the realistic market range for the role and location before the conversation happens (not after an offer is on the table), let the employer state a number first when possible rather than anchoring low by naming a figure yourself, and negotiate specific, researched terms rather than a vague general request for 'more.' Even where negotiation room is limited (common for large-batch campus hiring with fixed pay bands), understanding the full compensation structure — base pay, any joining bonus, benefits — matters for evaluating an offer accurately.

Learn More

Indeed Career Guide — Interview Tips

<https://www.indeed.com/career-advice/interviewing>

GeeksforGeeks — Technical Interview Preparation

<https://www.geeksforgeeks.org/interview-preparation/>

Harvard Business Review — Negotiation

<https://hbr.org/topic/subject/negotiation-strategies>